Cultural Directions

Good drainage is essential. Give plenty of light, but protect the plants from direct sunlight in summer time. They should have a raised bed if set outdoors or potted and pots plugged so they can be taken up readily for storage and protection through the winter months. Some cacti will stand temperatures below zero, especially those from the highlands of the Western States. These plants can ordinarily be left outside if given protection through the winter months.

Water sparingly when they are dormant or resting if you would have profuse blooming when growth starts after rest period, which should be at least 2 to 3 months, preferably through the winter months.

For planting use a mixture of one-third coarse sand, one-third fine leaf mold, and one-third good garden soil, and if it does not contain lime, add hydrated lime and ground charcoal in small quantities.

A simple method of setting cacti and succulents in pottery—Make up a quantity of soil, any good garden soil is all right, add a small amount of hydrated lime and mix with water until it is soft enough to barely pour. Remove most of the roots especially from cacti, and dip in hydrated lime, then fill container with mud and push plant into position, cover soil with crushed rock or shells and let dry. In the case of cacti, do not water any more for at least a month. Some succulents will stand a large amount of water, but it is best to water sparingly until plants show signs of new growth.
